

Pre-Existing Conditions Disclosure Guide

Honest, practical guidance on disclosing a chronic condition during your medical examination - and why doing so rarely causes rejection.

The core principle

Honesty is essential here. Failing to disclose a pre-existing condition when asked can lead to visa cancellation or even deportation later - much more serious than the condition itself would ever be.

What Must Be Disclosed

If you have diabetes, asthma, a mental health condition, or any other chronic illness, disclose it during your medical examination when asked. Destination countries are assessing whether the condition is manageable and whether you can afford ongoing treatment - not looking for a reason to exclude you.

What to Prepare

- ☐ Medical records: diagnosis reports and prescriptions, ideally covering the last 6 months for a chronic condition
- ☐ Affordability proof: evidence you can cover ongoing treatment costs, factored into your financial planning
- ☐ A doctor's letter on letterhead, confirming the condition is stable and you're fit to study abroad
- ☐ A brief management plan: how you'll access doctors, maintain medication supply, and handle emergencies

Don't panic

Manageable conditions rarely cause a visa rejection on their own. Destination countries want to see that you're aware of the condition, prepared for it, and financially capable of managing it - mental health support, diabetes management, and asthma treatment are all routinely accepted when properly documented.
